Facebook has published a public API for the Facebook Platform, which it describes as "a set of SDKs and tools that developers use to build apps, games, and experiences on Facebook." The platform allows developers to upload code that would allow their website or Facebook page to make decisions and learn how to best interact with Facebook users. What can Facebook learn? Facebook can learn about users' interests, tastes, and connections, but also historical information on the people and pages that a user has interacted with. It can also learn through social interactions and start to predict things like what actions a user will take when they're about to post something. In a statement Facebook CTO Mike Schroepfer said: Facebook is an open platform and today we're opening it up even more. The Facebook Platform enables developers to integrate their apps and experiences with a rich set of social features, people, pages and more. The platform, which was first announced at this year's F8 conference, will allow the development of the Facebook News Feed as a service that not only learns what people are interested in, but how to serve them better through proactive content and paid product placement. Developers will be able to put AI and machine learning at their disposal through this platform, potentially allowing them to create their own virtual assistant. Facebook's platform has also been designed to include a range of different AI tools and the Facebook Assistant, which features as part of 82157476af
